The son of a wheelwright, Alfred Carson was educated at the Guildford Government School. Realising the importance of an education, Carson then undertook four years of training as a pupil teacher at the Perth Boys' School. His diligence was noted and in September 1878 the Geraldton Board of Education appointed him to the position of headmaster of the Government Boys' School. Not quite nineteen, Carson holds the record for being the youngest headmaster of an Australian school.

At that time the school was held in what is now known as the Missions to Seamen building in Marine Terrace. Work commenced on building a new school in Fitzgerald Street. By the end of 1878, Carson and a paid monitor were teaching a class of 62 boys.

Carson married Eva Massingham of Dongara on 5 August 1884, in the Wesleyan Chapel at Geraldton. His students had reason to celebrate the occasion as the school was closed for the day.

The local newspaper, the Victorian Express, was also printed in the school building and in spare moments, Carson sometimes set type and read proofs. It was through assisting with the workings of this paper that Carson realised that here was the opportunity to bring understanding and knowledge to a far greater community than was possible through the classroom. In July 1886 Carson resigned as headmaster to take up the position of editor of the Victorian Express.

In appreciation for his past commitment to the school, Mr Gale, Chairman of the District Board of Education, presented Carson with a fish knife and fork and invited him to join the Board.

When the Geraldton and Murchison Telegraph commenced in July 1892, Carson was appointed editor. But by now Carson was restless, and seeking a bigger stage from which to work. He moved to Perth in the mid 1890s, to further his editorial career by working for the West Australian and Western Mail. It was written of Carson, "He was a man who did good as a first instinct and looked for goodness in everyone he met".
